The Southern negro, it seems to us, has four enemies among the Southern white men today. First, the plain, old-fashioned negro-hater. Second, the negro-cheater-and-exploiter. Third, the radical agitator who enlists the negro for programs that can bring only danger and defeat. And, finally, the maudlin sentimentalist who, in self-conscious “love” of the negro, embarrasses both races with his excesses and his insensitivity to fact, exciting the very antagonisms he thinks to soothe.

The Sportlight

By GRANTLAND RICE

AS WE GROW OLDER
No one knows where the road takes us
Out from the Inn as the curtain falls
No one knows where the barque of Charon
Points its prow when the darkness calls
Facing the fog with a dream to guide us
Stumbling on to a grave new-made
Take this thought to your souls, my brothers
Nothing strikes at the unafraid

What if the sunset’s drawing nearer?
What if the shadows gather in
Thick with ghosts of the mates who’ve headed
Into space where the comets spin
Eyes to the front, though the mists are heavy
Life as best is a brief parade
Keep one dream in your heart brothers
Nothing shatters the unafraid

Valentines—story of day make some
MEANDERING

There's a little winding valley,
Near by the St. Johns River flows;
In that wooded sylvan valley,
The glorious flaming azalea grows.
Millions and millions of flowers,
Spreading over the whole hill side;
Along the trails we spend the hours,
And let our thoughts in fancy ride.

Among the trees a babbling brook,
Fed by the springs under the hill;
Rounds the bend of a shady nook,
And turns the wheel of a water mill.
The paths lead on to changing scenes
Of sacred lilies 'round the bend;
Then ferns and palms and evergreens,
Make dreamland seem to never end.

The magnolia in its ma-jes-ty,
Vies with the cypress lofty spire;
Yellow jessamine runs wild and free,
And flame vine shows its crimson fire.
Down lover's lane just made for two,
We'll find a cozy resting place;
Where mocking birds will sing for you,
And wood nymphs show their happy face.

The moss draped oak and stately pine,
Form nature's temple of the blue;
And in that hushed and solemn shrine,
A quieting peace steals over you.
Among the azaleas in the valley,
By the wee lakes and water fall;
We hear the voice of the valley,
And heed the flowery springtime call.
